May's Brexit transition demand 'would penalise EU citizens'

Theresa May's demand that EU nationals coming to the UK during a Brexit transition deal should enjoy fewer rights than those already in the country would amount to "penalising citizens", Guy Verhofstadt has said.

Verhofstadt, the European parliament's Brexit coordinator, said May was "not very serious" when she proposed the idea.

He said: "It's not acceptable for us that rules will continue without change for financial services, for goods, for whatever other business, and only for the citizens, their situation will change. That is penalising citizens."

He added: "For us that is not acceptable. We do not even want to be talking about it."

The Belgian MEP was equally blunt when asked about UK hopes for a final deal that would mean different arrangements for different sections of the economy.

"That will not be the outcome of these negotiations. It cannot be the outcome," Verhofstadt told BBC's Andrew Marr Show, saying he could not countenance a trade deal that would also see the UK seek advantage through lower taxes and regulations.

His comments came as the shadow foreign secretary, Emily Thornberry, said it seemed inevitable the UK would have to stay in some sort of customs union after Brexit, a further indication of what seems to be a gradual Labour shift on the issue.

She told ITV's Peston on Sunday: "We cannot see a way forward when it comes to Northern Ireland or to tariff-free trade across Europe without us being in some form of customs union that probably looks very much like the customs union that there is at the moment, and that's our position on that."

During her trip to China at the end of last month, May raised the idea of different rights for EU citizens who arrive after March 2019, during a transition period expected to last until the end of 2020.
